The cytoplasmic domain is not present in all cadherins, but in those which possess it, it is essential for the cadherins adhesive function. The cadherins which do not possess a cytoplasmic domain appear to function via a different method from those with a cytoplasmic domain. The proteins encoded by these sequences are involved in cell-cell adhesion. The proteins may have resultatory functions in the cell, as well as the cell-cell adhesive properties. Antibodies produced against the encoded sequences are useful for modulating the bluding activity of protocadherins, and can be used the expectation.

Zapol is an andiopoletin homologue. The polypeptide is used to stimulate cell growth and tissue development. The polypeptides form multimeric proteins. Zapol has angiogenic or hematopoletic activity. Zapol the proteins can be used in assays for anglogenic activity. Zapol

The protein has an "IO motif" which is defined as an amino acid sequence of 20-40 amino acids in length containing an isolencine residue immediately collowed by a glutamine residue which has at least 50 percent sequence similarity to the consensus sequence shown in W18823.
